Dear BCSFen:

I go away for two weeks, and everything piles up! Honestly! Suddenly, I have three issues of BCSFazine to catch up with, issues 515 to 517. And, I will do that now.

[The fact that I suddenly started publishing every two weeks to get back on schedule probably doesn't help. ☹]

515...I always figured that correspondence is key in this fanzine thing, so every LOC I write goes into a file I keep on my computer, and I also put them on my LiveJournal. Does anyone use LiveJournal any more? Mine is my LOC archive. If you wonder where my LOC went, you can go to my LiveJournal to find it, or just ask me, and I will fish it out of my personal archive.

[I still have a LiveJournal but I haven't used it in a long time.]

The American presidential race. Ick! Urghh! Yuck! I've never seen anything so ridiculous, and I've never seen the Rethuglicans sink so low. There must be a sizable percentage of right-wing voters who cannot stomach the ideas of Donald Trump as president. They should thank their lucky stars that None of the Above isn't on the ballot. America a democracy? Well, so many brag about it, but right now, it is an oligarchy, and democracy goes to the highest bidder, which is definitely not the typical American citizen/voter.

[This has been a weird election.]

My LOC...we did okay at the Bazaar of the Bizarre, and at the Alice/Steampunk Invasion event at Historic Benares House in Mississauga. After that, we had our amazing trip to England, and what fun it was. Yvonne had her Harry Potter adventures in Watford and at the Platform 9¾ shop at Kings Cross station (went there four times), and we had our steampunk fun in Lincoln at the Asylum. Can't believe it's come and gone! Then, we went to Hamilton for the Locke Street Festival, and we vended there...rain and wind all day.

The Aurora Awards...I did not nominate or vote this year. I didn't feel I knew anything about the field this year. Given the motion to allow pros to vie for the fan Auroras for unpaid writing, I suspect that fans will not be able to win the fan Auroras. More and more, the fandom we knew is going away, and motions like this push fandom closer to the brink of extinction.

I know Steve Baldassara, and yes, he's a big guy. I've been called the same, and at one point, I weighed 230 pounds. Given my 5'4" height, I should never weigh that much. I cut back on snacking to get me down to 221 lbs., but couldn't get below that. Yvonne found a low-carb diet we could both follow, so now I am down to 205 lbs., and hope to lose some more weight.

[Best wishes! I am also trying to lose weight.]

516...John Purcell, come to Ontario! There's still some fandom here, plus steampunk that you and Valerie will enjoy. Trump and Clinton are now about neck and neck, and some polls predict a Trump victory. I am happy to be on this side of the border. Still looking for work, but I have applied to a lot of great jobs recently, and fingers continue to be crossed. (If you do go to Cape Breton...well, my father's side of the family is originally from there. There are great bars in Dominion and Donkin. That's about all I know.)

And there's my birthday. I'm a young sprite of 57 years. How's I get so old so fast? (We all ask ourselves that question.)

[Personally, I blame myself.]

(Saw the other day that there is now a Harlan Ellison biography due to be released shortly. Brace yourselves...)

517...I think Bernie Sanders could be a valuable asset to a Clinton administration, if only his supporters could get rid of their hate-on for Hillary. MC Hammer pants...nah, too much material. Maybe in Vancouver. In Toronto, we'd need them made of flannel for those cold winters.

A question...who thinks Star Trek Beyond is the final reboot movie? I heard some good reviews, but for the first time in my life, this was a Trek movie I didn't care to see, and I didn't. Did I miss something good? Or is it just more exploding starships and lens flares?

[The last Star Trek movie I saw was Star Trek: Nemesis (2002).]

Yvonne gets sleepy with caffeine. I get perky. And, I've already had two cups today, which is probably why I am getting anything at all done today. I remember Jolt Cola fondly...it couldn't say "twice the caffeine" here, for it would then qualify as a pharmaceutical, and couldn't legally be sold.

Mission accomplished. This weekend, Yvonne and I will head down to Niagara-on-the-Lake for the Grand Canadian Steampunk Exposition. Just for the Saturday... should be great fun. And, I may have some involvement with CSFFA soon...juicy hint at what may come. Take care, and have a great weekend.

Yours,

Lloyd Penney

Hola BCSFarios! It's your intrepid reporter again, giving you all the inside scoop on the life of a student at VFS.

It's just as glamorous as it sounds.

I reached a milestone recently: I have finished the first draft of my first ever screenplay. Yes, I, Michael "Fruvous" Bertrand, have written a movie. It needs a lot of work, of course, being only the first draft. But it was fun to write, despite it taking a lot out of me (or perhaps because it did) and I think it would make a pretty good flick, although probably not a summer blockbuster. More like a charming indie movie, or maybe some channel's Movie of the Week.

I'm also $\frac{2}{3}$ of the way through my first ever TV episode script, an episode of Bob's Burgers. Golly, I am productive.

Now on the LOCing!

Re: Dave Haren and BS:

I totally agree that people need to find something to fill the belief system "module" in their minds. That's because we clever monkeys are aware of what we do not know. We can see the edges of our knowledge and when we reach a space where we cannot even imagine figuring out an answer, we invent, adopt, or absorb one in order to maintain the continuity of one's knowledge. Thus, the extremely vital sense that one knows enough to function in the world is maintained, and as long as the invented belief is about things with no direct bearing on the individual's life, it is actually extremely functional no matter how illogical or irrational said belief is.

Many of us brainy nerdy intellectual types think this need can be filled by logic, rationality, and science. But that is only true if the individual actually understands science. Many do not. And even when they do, science is rational and hence, by nature, incomplete. So science can perform some of the functions of a belief system, [but] it can never actually complete the job.

Thus, there will always be the need for something to fill the gaps.

So I cannot agree that science and reason are always the best way out of the morass of non-rational belief systems. It certainly can cut through the irrationality of many religions' world views, but it cannot actually fill the void that leaves behind.

But enough of my incandescent gas. Seeya next ish, folks!

Notes from June 2016 BCSFA Meeting

In attendance were Barb Dryer (secretary), Graeme Cameron (chairman/archivist), Kathleen Moore (treasurer), Ray Seredin (host), Felicity Walker (editor), Michael “Fruvous” Bertrand, Julian Castle, Joe Devoy, William Graham, Teresa Spanics, and Sidney Trim.

Topic: the death of physical media, DRM, etc. Archiving things. CBC. My mother’s library of audio tapes. Fruvous said something about German engineers. Ray mentioned 16 RPM records used for full-length operas or congressional sessions and hearings. Ray said that there was a Rocky & Bullwinkle where they were in a jet that was running out of fuel. They played one of the congressional records because politicians are full of hot air.

Graeme said that a dry topic can be made interesting and a great topic can be made boring by the quality of the writing. This reminded me of the zine Opuntia and some of the topics (such as clearing branches off a road) that were made surprisingly interesting by the good writing quality.

Someone (Graeme?) said that bathroom graffiti has been found in Pompeii saying things like “Secundus defecated here” and “Apollinaris, personal physician of the emperor Titus, defecated well here.” This sort of thing is omitted from the classier books on Pompeii.

This reminded Fruvous of a Woody Allen sketch with intellectual prostitutes, which reminded me of the Woody Allen movie Shadows and Fog (1991).

Graeme said that the bubonic plague is still with us, but you can only catch it in Mongolia or the Rockies and it’s treatable now. Graeme also mentioned some new facts about HP Lovecraft. Lovecraft was drafted by the army, but before he was called in his mother went to the army and said “You can’t hire him; he’s insane.” He only got as far as grade eleven in school. During a depressed period in his late teenage years, he slept 20 hours a day, never left the house, and only wore his bathrobe. It was normal in the 1890s for boys to be dressed like girls until about age two; for Lovecraft it was until age six. He married a Jewish woman, Sonia Green, and she lived until the 1970s!¹²

“Obey Giant! Frodo lives!”

Graeme reported that conventions being cancelled or shutting down is a trend continent-wide. I said that I tried to explain VCON to my stand-up comedy course classmates and their closest point of reference was Creation-style conventions. Graeme thought that the idea of SF as a genre is fading and modern fans are into specific subgenres, fandoms, topics, shows, and writers.

¹² Also, she was a pulp writer and a fanzine and APA publisher!—Future Felicity

Fruvous had a brilliant idea: that with modern 3D printers you could set up a business making HO versions of real people so that they can put themselves into their model trains!

Ray mentioned Laura Ingalls Wilder, but to my surprise, also mentioned Jeanne Moos.¹³

Kathleen reported that the VCON refrigerator is full-size and hard to move. Ray said that it dates back to VCON 2 (1972). Kathleen added that they would like some smaller fridges and coolers. Ray suggested “keg fridges” which Fruvous said are also called “kegerators.”

[Breaking] Herschell Gordon Lewis (1929–2016)

Herschell Gordon Lewis: US director, died 26 September, aged 87. Nicknamed the “Godfather of Gore,” Lewis achieved greater career success as a leading figure in the US direct marketing industry, writing more than 20 books on the subject. Entered movie-making in 1961 with a series of “nudie” exploitation releases, but made his mark with Blood Feast (1963) and Two Thousand Maniacs! (1964). Later genre credits include Something Weird, A Taste of Blood and The Gruesome Twosome (all 1967), The Wizard of Gore (1970), [and] The Gore Gore Girls (1972). He returned to directing with 2002’s Blood Feast 2, and Herschell Gordon Lewis’ Bloodmania is currently in post-production.

VCON 37 Thoughts, Part 3

Michael Bertrand

This is when things get really cool.

First panel of the day (I think... memories are beginning to fade. Better get this stuff blogged out ASAP) was a ton of fun called “Greetings from Hollyweird.” It was that most prized (to entertainment industry wannabe me) of things, a panel where people who work in the industry here in Hollywood North show up at the convention to answer questions from the paltry peons like myself.

Sadly, only three of the seven guests listed showed up, and none of them was a writer. That was what I really wanted, to talk to a Real Live Honest to Goodness Television Writer, and get some tips for getting into the business from them, or at least to hope some of their magical “industry insider” pixie dust rubs off on me.

Instead, it was two artists (one storyboard guy just starting out and one highly experienced illustrator) and an actor who has had small roles in a bunch of sci-fi stuff.

Still, it was a good talk. I just enjoyed feeling closer to what I want as my eventual dream job: to be a full-time writer for TV. And they had cool insider stories about what it is like to work in Hollywood North and do arts for the biz.

Rather handily, the one who was an actor (sorry, I would love to credit you, but I am terrible with names) is also a theater producer, and exhorted us to pick up a mini-flyer for his latest production at the panel's end, which was the perfect bridge between my desire to talk to them and my social anxiety. I went up, picked up a flyer, and asked them if they knew anything about the writing end of the game.

They didn't really know much, but I think they saw how nervous and eager I am, so they told me to write stuff, film it, and put it on the Internet.

Which is pretty much what I plan to do if I can ever get my video camera connected to the computer again.

Next I went to Hospitality, where I met my nemesis: a big jar of miniature peppermint patties.

Whatever resolve I had to not be a bad diabetic exploded into a million shreds because I am an utter slave to anything with mint and chocolate together. They are both awesome apart, but put them together and something marvelous happens in my brain and I cannot get enough.

So I was a bad, bad boy last weekend. I hope my pancreas can forgive me.

After that, it was on to the second-best thing I do every year at the con, the Elron and Faned awards. For those who do not know, the Elrons are the oldest science fiction anti-awards in the world, given to only the worst and dimmest in the world. They are administered by R. Graeme Cameron, who delivers them with such marvelous dry wit (and to universally deserving targets) that is an absolute delight to attend the ceremony. It is a ray of elegant hilarity and this year was no different.

And then there were the Faned awards, which R. Graeme Cameron also does. They are awards he bestows upon the best in Canadian fanzine publishing, both to recognize quality and to encourage their continued existence in this increasingly digital era.

And I won one!

Believe me, I was as surprised as you are if not more so. I had absolutely no idea it was coming. He gave me the award for best "LOC hack," which is fanzine slang for someone who writes LOCs (letters of comment) to one or more fanzines.

And apparently, he liked my LOCs to BCSFazine so much, he thought I deserved an award. And he had such nice things to say about me that it makes me blush to think of them! He said mine was the kind of letter writing that elevated the whole LOC field.

I swear, I am incandescent in the infrared right now, I am so flushed. I had no idea I was so humble. I suppose I always figured I could handle that sort of thing with flair or at least composure. But it was so unexpected! I was completely flummoxed. And, of course, incredibly pleased.

But at the same time, part of me wanted to disappear into a crack in the floor. Everyone was looking at me all of a sudden! Ah, the perils of being shy by nature. But perhaps it was for the best. If I had been ready for it, I might have hammed it up and given people the wrong impression.

Instead, I blushed like a courtesan and hopefully came across as adorable.

After that major wonder whammy, I went to a panel called “You’ll Get My Books When You Pry Them from My Cold, Dead Hands.” You can figure out what that was about. We had a good talk about real books versus ebooks, and whether they will stop printing books in our lifetime. The consensus was that print on demand will always be there, and that there’s a lot to be said for ebooks, but those of us who grew up loving books will never let ours go.

That’s certainly true for me. I have no real desire to get an ebook reader. I love books beyond all reason. I find libraries and book stores inherently happy places. I am not just a lover of reading, I am a bibliophile. I cannot imagine life without a book at my bedside and hundreds of more on shelves.

I will get an ebook reader eventually, I am sure. But I will never let my books go. I heart them. As a lonely child, books were my only friends.

And you do not give up on friends just because something cooler comes along.

After that, I went to the Turkey Readings, which are, officially, the most fun I have all year. Briefly, the panelists read terrible sci-fi and/or fantasy novels, and people can bid to stop the reading, and then others can bid to start it again.

While this is going on, volunteers from the audience act out the story, taking on the various roles. And being the ham I am, I volunteered a few times, and had a blast, and best of all, made the audience laugh.

And for a comedy nerd like me, that laughter is the best drug in the world.

After that, we went to dinner with some friends at a nearby Red Robin, and then it was back to Richmond to sleep in our own beds once more, and dream of next year.

And that was about it, really.

Tomorrow, I resume having to think about what to write again.
